College recruiting Walk-ons may be awarded a In college athletics in the United States, recruiting is the process in which college coaches add prospective student athletes to their roster each off-season. There are instances, mostly at lower division universities, where no athletic scholarship can be awarded and where the player pays for tuition, housing, and textbook costs out of pocket or from financial aid. financial aid or scholarship. In football, place kickers, punters, and long snappers frequently join teams as recruited walk-ons. Recruiting rules seek, as much as possible, to control intrusions into the. This process typically culminates in a coach extending an athletic scholarship offer to a player who is about to be a junior in high school or higher. During this recruiting process, schools must comply with rules that define who may be involved in the recruiting process, when recruiting may occur and the conditions under which recruiting may be conducted 786ff48233
