Tea blending and additives This occurs chiefly with black tea, which is blended to make most tea bags, but it can also occur with such teas as Pu-erh, where leaves are blended from different regions before being compressed. Tea blending is the act of blending different teas (and sometimes other products) to produce a final product that differs in flavor from the original Tea blending is the act of blending different teas (and sometimes other products) to produce a final product that differs in flavor from the original tea used. The most prominent type of tea blending is commercial tea blending, which is used to ensure consistency of a batch on a mass scale so that any variations between different batches and seasons of tea production do not affect the final product. Commercially, it is considered important that any batch of a particular blend must taste the same as the previous batch, so a consumer will not be able to detect a difference in flavor from one purchase to the next e14f649de5
