Checkout charity can be effective at raising money for charities through the cumulative results of many small donations over time. General attitudes towards checkout charity by customers can vary, from positive to negative. Positive reactions from customers can include an association of the halo effect. Negative reactions can result from customers feeling pressured or anxious when prompted to donate to a charitable cause in this context. They may also be concerned about how such funds are used. Customers may also feel annoyed, particularly if they do not deem the cause to be a worthy one, as they are likely to receive prompts to donate at several retailers in their day-to-day lives. A 2013 Ipsos poll determined that the majority of Canadians had a negative reaction towards... f8dd654683 == Merchant Referral Program == f8dd654683 in information management, it means blocking a file for editing; see Revision control f8dd654683
