

Sabertooth Cats Ice Age Animals

Saber-toothed mammals have been found almost worldwide from the Eocene epoch to the early Holocene epoch (52.4 million years ago – 8,200 years ago). One of the best-known genera is the "saber-toothed cat" Smilodon, the species of which, especially S. fatalis, are popularly referred to as "saber-toothed tigers", although they are not closely related to tigers (Panthera), and are instead members of the extinct cat subfamily Machairodontinae (the true saber-toothed cats), most members of which had saber-teeth of varying lengths.

Cat gap The cause of the "cat gap" is disputed, but it may have been caused by changes in the climate (global cooling), changes in the habitat and environmental ecosystem, the increasingly hypercarnivorous trend of the cat-like predators (the nimravids), volcanic activity, evolutionary changes in dental morphology of the Canidae species present in North America, or a periodicity of extinctions called van der Hammen cycles. The cat gap is a period in the fossil record of approximately 25 million to 18.5 million years ago in which there are few fossils of cats or cat-like species found in North America following the extinction of nimravids. 5 million years ago in which there are few fossils of cats or cat-like species The cat gap is a period in the fossil record of

Among the earliest animals that can be described as "sabertooths" were Middle-Late Permian (~274-252 million years ago) non-mammalian therapsids including the gorgonopsians as well as some basal therocephalians (lycosuchids and scylacisaurids). 6a62cd32ac
