It has four confirmed subspecies and a fifth proposed one. Evidence from fossils and DNA sequencing shows that the two species are humans' closest living relatives. The species lives in groups with up to 200 members, although individuals travel and forage in much smaller groups during the day. The species lives in a strict male-dominated hierarchy, where disputes are generally settled without the need for violence. Nearly all chimpanzee populations have been recorded using tools, modifying sticks, rocks, grass and leaves and using them for hunting and acquiring honey, termites, ants, nuts and water. The species has also been found creating sharpened sticks to spear small mammals. Its gestation period is eight months.
