Alpha process The alpha process most commonly occurs in massive stars and during supernovae. The other class is a cycle of reactions called the triple-alpha process, which consumes only helium, and produces carbon.

Alpha particle Such alpha particles are termed "long range alphas" since at their typical energy of 16 MeV, Alpha particles, also called alpha rays or alpha radiation, consist of two protons and two neutrons bound together into a particle identical to a helium-4 nucleus. Because they are identical to helium nuclei, they are also sometimes written as He2+ or 42He2+ indicating a helium ion with a +2 charge (missing its two electrons). Alpha particles are named after the first letter in the Greek alphabet, α. Once the ion gains electrons from its environment, the alpha particle becomes a normal (electrically neutral) helium atom 42He. They are generally produced in the process of alpha decay but may also be produced in different ways. most probably (90% probability) being an alpha particle. Both processes are preceded by hydrogen fusion, which produces the helium that fuels both the triple-alpha process and the alpha ladder processes. After the triple-alpha process has produced enough carbon, the alpha-ladder begins and fusion reactions of increasingly heavy elements take place, in the order listed below. Each step only consumes the product of the previous reaction and helium. The later-stage reactions which are... 0ff4a51e13
