A tunnel is an underground passageway with no defined minimum length, though it may be considered to be at least twice as long as wide. Some government bodies define a tunnel as 150 metres (0.093 mi) in length or longer. 790b682544 The longest tunnel in the United Kingdom is the

Northern line at 27,800 metres... 790b682544 A tunnel may be for pedestrians or cyclists, for general road traffic, for motor vehicles only, for rail traffic, or for a canal. Some are aqueducts, constructed purely for carrying water—for consumption, for hydroelectric purposes or as sewers—while others carry other services such as telecommunications cables. There are even tunnels designed as wildlife crossings for European badgers and other endangered species. 790b682544

Geographic information system GeoSPARQL is a standard developed by the Ordnance A geographic information system (GIS) consists of integrated computer hardware and software that store, manage, analyze, edit, output, and visualize geographic data. In a broader sense, one may consider such a system also to include human users and support staff, procedures and workflows, the body of knowledge of relevant concepts and methods, and institutional organizations. Much of this often happens within a spatial database; however, this is not essential to meet the definition of a GIS. metadata standards are being proposed by the W3C Geo Incubator Group to represent geospatial data on the web 790b682544
