== Biography == In Emilia-Romagna, a new electoral law was approved by the Legislative Assembly in July 2014, abolishing the blocked list. The voter can express one or two preference votes for the candidates on the chosen list; in the case of the expression of two preferences, these must concern candidates of different sex according to "gender preference" (under penalty of annulment of the second preference). As regards the election of the councilors, the law guarantees in any case at least 27 seats on the lists that support the elected president (majority prize), obtaining effects that are very similar to those of the list but acting on the provincial lists. The first 40 seats are distributed on a proportional basis. A seat is then attributed to the candidate for president who came second. The remaining 9 seats are assigned by majority method to the lists that support... On 26 January, Conte offered his resignation as Prime Minister; President Sergio Mattarella consequently started consultations for the formation of a new Government, which ultimately resulted in Mario Draghi being sworn in as Prime Minister on 13 February. De Ambris was born in Licciana Nardi, a town in the province of Massa-Carrara, as the first of the eight children of Francesco De Ambris and Valeria Ricci. His father was a Mazzinian Republican, and from an early age De Ambris showed an interest in politics. The miserable condition of the Lunigiana workers and their struggles led him to join the socialist movement at the age of 18, becoming a militant and propagandist for the Italian Socialist Party in 1892 and taking part in the formation of numerous socialist circles in his region, especially those in Aulla and La Spezia, of which he was a member. The PSI was led by Riccardo Nencini from 2008 to 2019. Elected senator with the Democratic Party in 2013 and re-elected in 2018, he was deputy minister of Infrastructures and Transports from 2014 to 2019 (Renzi government and Gentiloni government). Since 2019, the party has been led by Enzo Maraio. Between 2019 and 2022, the PSI sat within the parliamentary group of Italia Viva in the Senate. In the 2022 Italian general election, the party lost its parliamentary representation.
