Allais paradox review Lewis, Michael. The Undoing Project: A Friendship That Changed Our The Allais paradox is a choice problem designed by Maurice Allais (1953) to show an inconsistency of actual observed choices with the predictions of expected utility theory. The independence axiom of expected utility theory, which requires that the preferences of an individual should not change when altering two lotteries by equal proportions, was proven to be violated by the paradox. Theory:The Rank-Dependent Expected Utility model. The Allais paradox demonstrates that individuals rarely make rational decisions consistently when required to do so immediately.
