Remote sensing in geology Though Remote sensing is used in the geological sciences as a data acquisition method complementary to field observation, because it allows mapping of geological characteristics of regions without physical contact with the areas being explored. of 3–4 °C on land surface or around −5 °C for sea water in earthquake epicenter areas. Remote sensing is conducted via detection of electromagnetic radiation by sensors. The electromagnetic radiation acts as an information carrier for two main variables. About one-fourth of the Earth's total surface area is exposed land where information is ready to be extracted from detailed earth observation via remote sensing. First, the intensities of reflectance at different wavelengths are detected, and. The contrast appears 7–14 days prior to the earth movement. The radiation can be naturally sourced (passive remote sensing), or produced by machines (active remote sensing) and reflected off of the Earth surface 9bd7ab575b

Harry O. Wood In the 1920s he co-developed the torsion seismometer, a device tuned to detect short-period seismic waves that are associated with local earthquakes. Wood suggested Harry Oscar Wood (1879-1958) was an American seismologist who made several significant contributions in the field of seismology in the early twentieth-century. instruments throughout the region that would be able to pinpoint earthquake epicenters and eventually allow mapping of the corresponding fault zones. In 1931 Wood, along with another seismologist, redeveloped and updated the Mercalli intensity scale, a seismic intensity scale that is still in use as a primary means of rating an earthquake's effects. Following the 1906 earthquake in San Francisco, California, Wood expanded his background of geology and mineralogy and his career took a change of direction into the field of seismology 9bd7ab575b
