Politics of climate change 1, 4 & 5. The centrality of fossil fuels and other carbon-intensive industries has resulted in much resistance to climate policy, despite widespread scientific consensus that such policy is necessary. See e. Dryzek (2011) Chpt. Since the Industrial Revolution, fossil fuels have provided the main source of energy for economic and technological development. agreement to have significant practical effect on human activity. Whether it actually is The politics of climate change results from different perspectives on how to respond to climate change. Global warming is driven largely by the emissions of greenhouse gases due to human activity, especially the burning of fossil fuels, certain industries like cement and steel production, and land use for agriculture and forestry. g. 3, and Dessler (2020) Chpt 161be95142
